Inside the reading

Seven of Pentacles

The Seven of Pentacles fell first, and it almost made me laugh with recognition. A young farmer leaning on his hoe, chin resting on his hands, looking at a vine where seven pentacles have already grown. No planting left to do, no pruning either. He stands in the middle of his own field, counting. And one pentacle lies loose at his feet, already fallen from the vine.

Ace of Pentacles

The Ace of Pentacles came next, and this is the card I most wanted to see in a question about a sale. A hand reaching out of a cloud, holding one solid gold coin over a garden of white lilies, a path leading through an arch of flowering hedge toward mountains in the distance. It is the most concrete card in the deck. Money, property, an offer with a number on it.

Two of Swords

The Two of Swords is your signal card, and it is a quiet one. A woman sits blindfolded on a stone bench by a still sea at night, two long swords crossed over her chest, a crescent moon above her. The water has no waves at all. That stillness is the whole message.

Five of Swords - reversed

The last card came out reversed, and I stayed with it longer than the others. Upright, the Five of Swords shows a smirking man gathering swords while two figures walk away toward a choppy sea, a win that tastes of nothing. Turned over, that whole scene folds inward. The conflict is not out in the open. It is being carried quietly, and in your case you are the one carrying it.
